3D Capture and Visualization for Meth Use Prevention

Face2Face system has been developed to fight the Methamphetamine epidemic by showing people at risk how their faces will look like in 6 months, 1 year and 3 years after using meth. By personalizing the drug awareness message, Face2Face is effective in educating and preventing meth use by showing the shocking visual changes meth causes.

History

The Mendocino County Sheriff's Office, in partnership with the Hopland Band of Pomo Indians, has created a Methamphetamine Awareness Program for Mendocino County. The two agencies were awarded a grant through the U.S. Department of Justice to combat methamphetamine related issues county wide.

Sheriff Tom Allman approached software developer Abalone LLC of Moss Beach, California with a request to develop a 3D software that can show the devastating effects of meth on a persons face. The result is Face2Face, which has been in operation since early 2009. institutions and community meetings.

"The 'Just Say No' didn't work. So we don't know what does work, but I can tell you that the (Face2Face) software is having more of a positive effect than anything that I've ever been involved with on the drug fight." Tom Allman, Sheriff

Since its introduction in Spring 2009, Face2Face has been deployed in dozens of Sheriff Departments and Police Departments across the country. SROs (School Resource Officers) use the system for classroom teaching and drug prevention. In addition to law enforcement and schools, the DEA (Drug Enforcement Agency) has fitted several field offices with Face2Face. The Army and US Air Force have also deployed the system. Face2Face has been featured in many local newspapers and nationally in ABC News and NPR's "Talk of the Nation" program.

"We just started to use Face2Face recently, but the response is overwhelming. Juveniles, for example, are very concerned about their appearance and seem to be shocked when observing the "before" and "after" 3D images.
