

Trina's Letter: Chasing a Dream

I am just so thankful! This past Sunday, I witnessed a sight that literally took my breath away. After struggling up and down an obstacle course of turnstiles and endless steps stuffed to overflowing with the crowds of New York City, my family and I emerged from this underground maze to cheer on my daughter and her husband, Arun, as they ran toward the finish line of the New York Marathon. They ran by us, encapsulated in the spirit of 40,000 runners from around the globe who were reaching for a dream. This was the culmination of months of arduous training and aching muscles, and the kids were grinning as they crossed the finish line, hand in hand.

I am thankful they have each other, that they share dreams, and they are part of a world in which people from every part of this earth have the courage to chase a goal and achieve it. We should all be thankful, because in a world like this, everything is possible.

Congratulations, Arun and Liza. We love you! Enjoy the brownies....
